Job prospects

- The number of welders active in the construction industry declined slightly in 2016, to 256. Almost a third of welders had to travel outside their home region to work.
- There are 130 companies hiring welders to work on construction sites. The civil engineering and roadwork sector provides more than half the work volume for welders. This sector should grow in coming years.
- Twelve new welders entered the industry in 2016, slightly below the annual average for the past four years (15). Welders earn an average annual income of $49,000, while those working at least 500 hours average $68,300.
- Job prospects are quite good for welders. Demand will decrease slightly in coming years but high employee turnover should create a need for new workers. Some workforce demand could be met by workers currently available.
